The Men's Shed Story

The 'shed' holds an important place in Australia's history and culture. It has been a repository of memories, experiences, and technology as well as a place to share skills and to socialise. Many of Australia's craftsmen first demonstrated their skills in their fathers' sheds and many of our country's best inventions have been born in the 'backyard shed'.

When men retire from the workforce they often feel a loss of identity and purpose. In addition, age and financial circumstance mean that many people have to downsize, giving up their backyard shed or workshop. Thus, the Community Men's Shed was born, providing a place where men can come and share a wide variety of tools and machinery, pursuing their own interests while spending time with other 'shedders' of similar interests.

In a cooperative environment men can learn new skills, use tools for the first time or keep old skills honed and productive. They can create personal projects, work on projects for other community groups or projects to support the development of the shed.

It is well recognised that men don't talk face to face. They talk shoulder to shoulder.
